- 1 Universities say a "societal shift" caused them to remove foreign language degrees and departments. They say there aren't enough students who want to study languages. Can years of study be replaced by AI or online translation tools?
- 2 No, says Michael Lynas, the UK director for the Duolingo language app.
- 3 "There's good cultural reasons to learn languages – the UK is part of a global world. There's a need to connect with other people in ways that translation tools can't do.
- 4 Information from Duolingo shows that UK users are more likely to learn multiple languages than people in other countries. People aged under 22 are the biggest group of app users.
- 5 We know there is a problem with formal language education, but it's not because young people aren't interested," Lynas said.
- 6 Megan Bowler is a student and lecturer at Oxford. She said that there is no national strategy in place to protect these important subjects.
- 7 "University language students are creative thinkers".
- 8 "These skills and intellectual values are now even more important in the age of AI."
- 9 Over the past five years, nearly 50 centres of French, German, Italian and Iberian studies closed or got smaller. Places like Nottingham University and Leicester University may close language departments.
- 10 Hannah Sutcliffe graduated from Leicester with a degree in Spanish and French. She said the languages, cultural awareness and critical thinking she developed are very important to her career.
- 11 In the past 30 years the students taking A-level French decreased from 30,000 to below 10,000. German decreased from 10,000 to about 2,000 each year.
- 12 Only Spanish made improvement. There are also small increases in other languages like Chinese. Fewer students now study languages at A-level and university.
- 13 Dr Emma Staniland is a lecturer in Spanish studies at Leicester.
- 14 "Students who come to university to study languages have a passion for it. In the future, it may be impossible for most students to choose language degrees. Modern language degrees will be for only rich people."
- 15 Dr Maite Usoz de la Fuente also lectures in Spanish at Leicester University. She said Brexit also made studying languages less attractive because it removed career options in Brussels, Paris and the rest of the EU.
- 16 "The people who come to study foreign languages with us want a degree that's going to allow them to work internationally."
